Resolutions to violence

The deviation after the revolution created a new social and political way of life. With resources being lost and violence rising it is time for Venezuela to rebuild its self. <sup>1</sup>

As Justice First a current opposition team begins to demand and take a stand so does Tomás Guanipa. With his support and him speaking put it has become more difficult for the current party to succeed. <sup>2</sup>

Improving the resources making it so police can catch and protect the people is what Justice First and Tomás Guanipa support. Improving all the current situations is his current goal. As shown in a recent situation where he stands on violence and his nation current government, “Today Maduro has again violated the constitution,” said opposition lawmaker Tomas Guanipa. “Why? Because he is scared of being recalled.” <sup>3</sup>

Steps suggested in general to reduce violence in Latin America that Justice First also believes in, are establishing manageable enforcing units, assign quality managers and grant them genuine authority, reform crime reporting and crime analysis, develop effective local crime investigations, establish effective oversight systems, building career programs for officers, develop explicit use-of force policies to control police violence and reform current corrupt criminal justice systems. <sup>4</sup>

The plunge of exportation of food in Venezuela falls, Mr. Guanipa and the party he supports, Justice First are turning to trading, to create some sort of economy for their people. Examples such as this showing Venezuela attempting to create an economy is trading oil for food with Jamaica.<sup>5</sup>

Justice First is a centre democratic party who strongly believes in human rights. Having the right to individuality, free speech, the right to a fair trial is what the party aims to create.

In conclusion Justice First, which is strongly supported by Tomás Guanipa is in interest in progressing the economy, human rights and the economy.
