Position Paper for the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization on Education and conservation

Since the introduction of Rwanda in the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, in 1962, we never underestimate the importance of this committee. Rwanda always had the important mission to take actions and to get involved in this organisation. Inevitably, we understand the importance of protecting World Heritage Sites and how the lose of Sites can be devastating for the planet Earth and our culture, but Rwanda currently the education is a pressing issue .

1. Governance and its effects on education

In every country, the education system has at least a couple differences due to cultural, historical and socioeconomic realities. Even though every sovereign country must be able to teach their children, their students, school subjects that they want, but this has a limit. Some corrupted governments refrain kids from across the world to go to school, at their desk. To solve this problem, Rwanda thinks that we must set up objectives that every country chooses for themselves. If they aren't reasonable or if they're way too unrealistic, some organisations like the World Bank could take care of some problem or reduce their financial input.

2. Preservation of World Heritage Sites

Even though this is an important topic, because a lost in whoever's culture is a lost for the world, Rwanda thinks maybe we could talk about this topic after the education for few reasons. First, not every country has heritage sites and even fewer have heritage sites in danger. However, we can't afford to lose any parts of our history, therefore we must sign agreements. Every relevant advocacy associations or countries must have could help preserve sites in danger. In other countries where there isn't war, countries must preserve the sites themselves.

3. Supporting and Accomplishing Education 2030

In recent years, Rwanda, our small country made a huge step forward for the access to education, we spent around 20 % of our budget in this sector. Sadly, not every country wants to do that necessary act. Therefore, the UNESCO needs to do something. Some programs like the International Bachelor is something we need to lean on as a group and we to set new standards around the world.
